Many clinicians are now aware of the increasing population of multi-problem, complex, co-occurring disordered clients. However they often lack training in both addiction and mental health treatment so that clients in withdrawal from alcohol and other drugs; and those with co-occurring disorders (COD) too often receive inadequate care, caught in the gap between the mental health and addiction treatment systems. Clinicians can feel ill equipped to face the variety of assessment, treatment and systems issues necessary to provide integrated co-occurring disorders services.

This workshop will offer guidelines to address clinical dilemmas in the assessment and treatment for those with co-occurring mental and substance-related disorders. It will also address the differences between the addiction and mental health systems to improve skills and systems issues in integrated COD services.

Learning Objectives:

1. Review the context and background of the behavioral health field that has created attitudinal and values differences contributing to fragmentation.
2. Apply assessment strategies, techniques and priorities to determine COD treatment options.
3. Identify staff, program and systems issues in providing integrated services for those with co-occurring mental and substance-related disorders.
4. Discuss how to improve the range and use of treatment services to better meet the needs of clients.
